Introduction

Regardless of your reasons for wanting to home school, one of the questions that is probably burning in your mind is:

Do I have what it takes to be an effective teacher?

Will your children buckle down and get the work done? Can you get rid of the distractions in their lives so they can learn and focus more easily? How do you separate family time from school time so it's well balanced?

And how will you still find time to complete your own personal tasks each day while still being available to your child?

Create a Reasonable Plan

In order to be successful with home schooling your child, you need to create a plan of action. Your child's school may be able to provide you with a curriculum you can follow. This might include worksheets, workbooks, or educational websites your child will need to use in order to complete specific tasks or assignments.

If you're lucky enough to have the school's help, your main job will be to make sure everyone's participating, everything's getting done on time, and everyone understands the lessons.

If your school isn't all that involved, don't panic. Yes, you'll be making up your own lesson plans, but you'll still have plenty of help. You want to base your plans around your child's grade level, their skills and abilities, and on the work they were doing at school (if you can find that out).
